The Laugesen Family

Christian Ludwig was born and raised among the lakes and forests of Soro, 44 miles west of Copenhagen. Louis's father Peter, was a gardener and married, Mette Christensdatter, a housekeeper in 1832. At age 16 he was accepted as a cadet gardener at the Academy and stayed there several years. In his early twenties he did his compulsory military service and fought against the Germans for the control Slesvig Holstein from October 1863 to August 1864.

After the war he worked in Teulland and there met Emilie Brammer, a dairymaid and married her in 1866. Their firstborn, Waldemar, was born in 1867 and Dagmar 18 months later and Louis Emil in December, 1870. Late in 1872 they decided to emigrate to New Zealand, never to see their brothers or sisters again. Despite all that was to follow they never regretted their decision.

Landing at Lyttelton on 5 January, 1873, Christian found work initially at Woodend where William was born then moved his family to Oxford. There he took labouring, harvesting and sawmilling work. He bought three acres of land and later built a house on a hill at the end of Bay Road. It was here that Christian became acquainted with the sawmilling business working initially on contract and later leasing a mill. At Oxford, Albert, Juliana and Frank were born before Emilie died in 1880 at thirty-four years. Emilie's sister Sophie came out to New Zealand to mother the young family and married Christian bearing him Theodore and Frederick before herself dying at the young age of thirty-one.

After sixteen years of unremitting hard work and frequent and devastating fires the family left Oxford in 1890 and went to Christchurch. Christian set up a small stationery business, and used the remains of his limited funds to start a cigarette factory. Christian himself had little patience with the slow pace of retail trade which was not very successful for him so he packed a swag, shouldered his axe, slasher and gun and set off with his sixteen year old son, Willie, for the North Island. After three months work at Alfredtown they returned to Christchurch and Wandle Bush beyond Waiau to start up another sawmilling enterprise, and were later joined by Louis Emil. After three years hard work in the Wandle Bush area they had cut out all the good timber and had to look further afield.

The 1880s saw a building boom in the Kaikoura township and there were still a number of fine stands of forest around Kaikoura. Early in 1893 the Laugesen team moved their sawmilling operation to Kaikoura, complete with sawmill, plant, wagon, dray and eight horses. After establishing a home in the Kaikoura township, Christian brought the rest of his family up from Christchurch. In the small coastal town the timber business prospered. By the mid 1890s the firm of Laugesen and Sons had cut more than a million feet of timber at the Grange, up Long Creek and along the Hapuku.

With three sons working in the sawmill, fifty-five year old Christian Laugesen took the opportunity to retire in 1895. Fit and strong in spite of years of hard physical work, he had outlived two wives and had nine children and four grandchildren. He was still an active man and in 1897 at the Kaikoura registry office married twenty-one year old Deborah Cooper.

A year later, in 1898, Deborah's first child Norman was born. Shortly afterwards Christian and Deborah moved to Marton and Carl, their second son, was born there. Christian farmed for a year before returning to Kaikoura to take up 4000 acres obtained in a land ballot. He built a house and worked hard on this remote farm for two years before selling and going south to Dunedin. There he bought sixty acres of salty swamp land near Port Chalmers and worked for two years. Here their third child, Ida, was born and they moved to Opotiki in 1904 buying two hundred acres nine miles up the Otara river. Tragedy struck when their daughter Ida was drowned in the river in 1906.

With heavy hearts the family left for Auckland and after a year moved to Arkles Bay on the Whangaparaoa peninsula. Here Deborah painted Christian's portrait in oils and here his memoirs end. Deborah left Christian in 1912 after fifteen years together. Christian did, however, find security with his daughter Julie and her husband, at their Tennessee station on the Old Taupo Road near Rotorua. One day in April 1915, with deteriorating faculties, he wandered off some five miles into the scrubland and lost his bearings. His body was found three weeks later. Christian's grave can be found in the Rotorua cemetery. He had become a naturalised citizen of New Zealand in 1902.

William Glassey Doyle's Special Constable's Baton

The Great Strike took place in New Zealand from October 1913 to mid-January 1914. It was the largest and most disruptive strike in New Zealand's history. At its height, it brought the economy of New Zealand almost to a halt. Between 14,000 and 16,000 workers went on strike, out of a population of just over one million.

The dispute began with a coal miners' strike in Huntly and on the Wellington waterfront, and quickly spread to other industries around the country.

In Auckland 800 mounted special constables were based at the Auckland Domain and from there they patrolled the wharf. They carried wooden batons. W.G.Doyle was one of the constables.
